In this book are covered three tourist destinations at the southern end of the world. For some it is the uttermost end, for others it is the beginning. Stefano Nicolini is an Italian photographer whose work covers especially the southern regions and the Antarctic. It reflects faithfully the area's unexpected landscapes. The world's southernmost city, Ushuaia, has all the magic of a pioneer settlement with a colorful mix of Nordic, Chilean and Argentine style buildings, is built on the Beagle Channel and lies south of the Andes mountain range which hereabouts starts to dip below the Atlantic. The Malvinas (Falklands) are disputed islands in the South Atlantic Ocean and are magnetic for their being little known. A small population of British descents turns its back on its nearest neighbors and have been involved in a long standing argument with Argentina which had been in possession of the islands until 1833 and still claims them. The imperturbable beauty of the white continent, the Antarctic, complete this photographic tour. Photographs of the wildlife wind up the subject. Bilingual texts describe the characteristics, history and main attractions of an off beat trip for special visitors.
